

One Love Louisville unites leaders at Data Summit

Healthy Discussion of measuring success

LOUISVILLE (October 9, 2015) – This afternoon representatives of communities, organizations and businesses are gathering to discuss how to measure the success of the One Love Louisville campaign.

The Data Summit offers a measure of accountability for all partners involved. Secondly, the summit serves as a potential benchmark for other cities to use, as Louisville is a national leader in open data metrics, according to <http://us-city.census.okfn.org/>.

“I am excited to see all these great members of our community come out and take on the challenge of accountability”, said Anthony Smith, Director for the Office of Safe and Healthy Neighborhoods. “Having good partners gives One Love Louisville a great chance at good results.”

Individuals who are participating in the Data Summit range from Kentucky One Health to the University of Louisville Office of Public Health and Information Sciences and the Community Foundation of Louisville amongst other organizations.
